

Passages - Euthryphro

I think he's unique among politicians in beginning his career in the right way. The right way is to concern yourself first with making the young as good as possible - just as you'd expect a good farmer to concern himself first with his young plants, and only after that with the others.

If something is done, or has something done to it, it isn't done because it's a thing which is done; it's a thing which is done because it is done.

Nor does it have something done to it because it's a thing which has something done to it; it's a thing which has something done to it because it does have something done to it.

SOCRATES: I don't think it's a question of 'Where fear is, there will reverence be found? I think a lot of people fear illness, poverty, and any number of things like that. They fear them. They don't feel any reverence for the things they fear. Don't you agree?

EUTHYPHRO: Absolutely.

SOCRATES: But I do think that where there is reverence, there also is fear. Doesn't anyone who feels reverence and awe about something feel fear as well? Isn't he afraid of getting a reputation for wickedness?
