

Passages - Thus Spake Zarathustra

Lo! I am weary of my wisdom, like the bee that hath gathered too much honey; I need hands outstretched to take it.

When Zarathustra was alone, however, he said to his heart:

Could it be possible! This old saint in the forest hath not yet heard it, that God is dead!

On mine honour, my friend, answered Zarathustra, there is nothing of all that whereof thou speakest: there is no devil and no hell. Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body: fear, therefore, nothing any more!

Sombre is human life, and as yet without meaning: a buffoon may be fateful to it.

The Superman, the lightning out of the dark cloud - man.

Ten truths must thou find during the day; otherwise wilt thou seek truth during the night, and thy soul will have been hungry.

The creator wished to look away from himself- thereupon he created the world. Intoxicating joy is it for the sufferer to look away from his suffering and forget himself.

Weariness, which seeketh to get to the ultimate with one leap, with a death-leap; a poor ignorant weariness, unwilling even to will any longer, that created all Gods and backworlds.
